Winifred Curran
Department of Geography
DePaul University

[T]he term “post-industrial” and “clean up” are misnomers that obscure the multiple ways industrialization remains a persistent feature of everyday life ...

[B]rownfield redevelopment, rather than representing a clean break with an industrial past, often reproduces the social relations of an older, industrial economy- particularly those related to racial and health injustices.

Environmental Gentrification

the convergence of urban redevelopment, ecologically minded initiatives and environmental activism in an era of advanced capitalism. Operating under the seemingly a-political rubric of sustainability, environmental gentrification builds on the material and discursive successes of the urban environmental justice movement and appropriates them to serve high-end redevelopment that displaces low income residents.
